What is "teen library participation?"

It is teens being directly involved in their libraries in ways that give them a voice and allow them to plan, run, and evaluate library activities for peers and in other aspects of the library.

Why teen library participation?

- Promotes positive youth development.
- Fosters teen resiliency.
- Encourages teens to become library users and supporters into adulthood.
- Helps to enhance our profession by encouraging teens to see library work as a great career opportunity.
- Steers the "traits of teenagers" in a positive direction.

Five teen traits that relate to youth participation:

- Awareness of one's self
- Uncertainty
- Hero worship
- Clannishness
- Audacity of belief

You can help to develop these traits in a positive direction through YP.

Did you know...

- The first libraries in the US did not have services for young people?
- The first examples of teen participation in libraries date back to the early 1900s, mostly in school libraries?
- The National Commission on Resources for Youth defined and promoted "youth participation" in 1967.
- YALSA (then YASD) has been instrumental in promoting youth participation, especially following the 1991 White House Conference on Library and Information Services.

Kinds of participation:

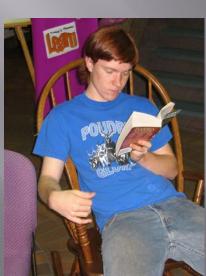

- Library teen advisory groups
- Teen volunteers
- Temporary/short-term projects & programs
- Creative contributions
- Outreach and partnering with community groups
- Technology-oriented
- Youth participatory evaluation
- Working with adult groups

Technology oriented:

- Teens create "book videos" to show on the library web page or on television.
- To see a Bookends show in action, use this link:

Youth participatory evaluation:

• Means asking teens what they think and following through with their recommendations.

- Allows teens to have a voice in what goes on in their libraries.
- This is accomplished by encouraging teens to work as partners with adults.

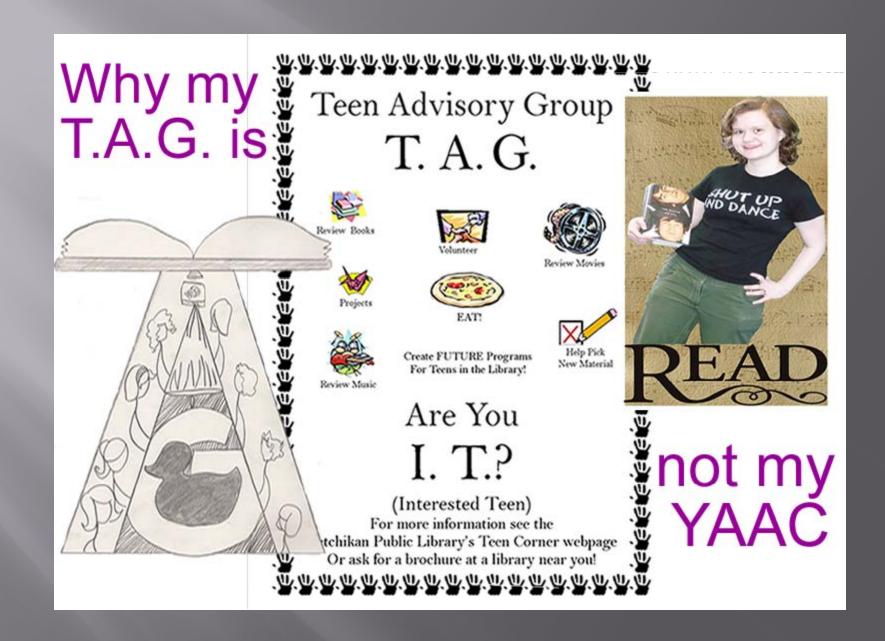

Teen participation can encourage library careers:

Listen. Yeah, really! They have things to say!

Training for teen participation:

Training is an essential step to planning and providing effective youth participation events, projects, and activities with your teens.

Evaluating teen library participation:

- Keep records of teen volunteer attendance and participation.
- Do evaluations after each program or activity and allow teen volunteers to see and discuss them.
- Ask the teens for their reactions and advice.
- Teen writing about a library activity can serve as feedback.

Rewards and recognition:

- Thank and praise your teens.
- Offer perks whenever you can.
- Be sure to publically recognize what they have accomplished.

Final tips:

- \blacksquare Have a leader or leaders who truly enjoy(s) teens.
- Always be on the lookout for new teen participatory ideas.
- Ask your teens what they would like to do.
- Be on the alert for new teens to get involved.
- Ask teens to invite siblings and friends.
- Provide good training and information.
- Follow up by evaluating your teen participatory activities.
- Have fun!!!
